BORN:

2008

Our Architecture + Design practice has been focusing on innovative design solutions that challenge the conventional interpretations of space, function, and material use.

Our studio's approach is ideas-driven, with dedication to artistic thinking and experimentation, testing designs that result in work that moves beyond just an aesthetic response. Through questioning, we seek to understand the nuances of each project and through imagination, we pursue meaningful solutions as the basis from which the final project grows.

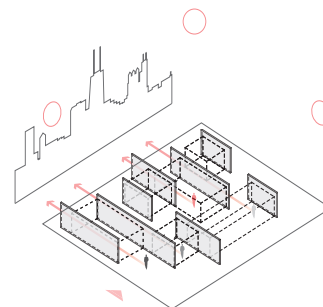

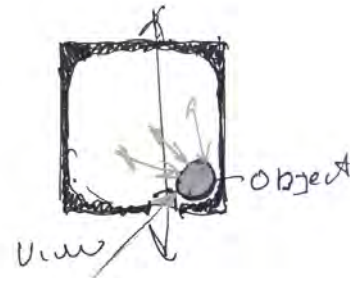

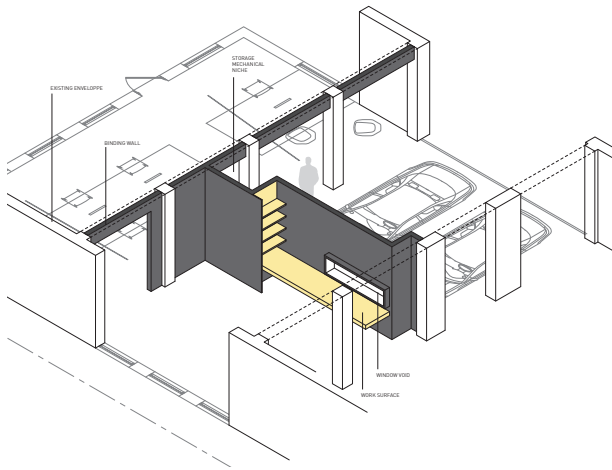

Having our work recognized, published and exhibited, our practice does not shy away from projects no matter the size, scope or place. We welcome all opportunities and clients who share our passion to create.

In order to maximize the views and daylight from within this lower floor, Mies Van Der Rohe landmark, the existing arrangement of sleeping and entertaining needed to be re-thought. In altering the location of these two primary functions and delicately separating them with a single sandblasted glass wall, the new configuration echoes the originally proposed Miesien plans. In articulating the demising area of the unit with a seemingly continuous wood wall and elegant detailing throughout, we paid a subtle tribute to the building's refined clarity and to the master of less is more.

This renovation and addition satisfied the need to update a facility which had been operating in a single story house for 25+ years. Our intervention was to offer a simple and efficient layout, while capitalizing on daylight.

A new skylight adds needed ceiling height for the raising of the Torah. The book shelves are a reminder that this is also a sanctuary for learning.

A deck with an overhanging roof, provides shelter and creates a gathering space. The kink in the façade responds to strict buildable area requirements and forms a new entry that re-appropriates square footage to the interior.

LOCOMOBILE LOFTS FITNESS CENTER

LOCATION: Chicago, Illinois
SCOPE: 400 SF Fitness Room Renovation
STATUS: Completed 2016
CLIENT: 2000 South Michgan
PHOTOGRAPHER: Mike Schwartz

After successfully renovating the common areas, we were invited back to redesign its fitness room: a hidden space with little known use. The fitness room needed a revised entry, distinguished from the existing unit doors. A large cut and subtle angle formalize the entry along the long narrow hall. A new glass door acts as an aperture the provides a sense of comfort and security. The undulating cladding is an exploration into how one occupies an inside corner. The perimeter becomes flexible with greater freedom to place objects. CNC technology for its construction highlights quality and craftsmanship.

The overall building form is the result of a rotation in the upper programmed volume. This shift allows the Center to face directly east, optimizing the direction of daily prayers. This configuration enables the complex to appear as though it opens-up and reaches-out, similar to Chabad's role within the Toledo community. To further reinforce the inviting character of this facility, the proposed façade treatment softens the building's rigid form. It evokes a sense of change and gentleness via the interplay of light and shadow on its rippling wood-clad folds.

A Chicago developer tasked us to create an office space within an existing masonry shell. Our strategy was to place emphasis on the character of the materials. A communal desk was placed in the center of the room and supported by two thin perforated metal screens, which cut it into smaller segments, defining multiple work areas. A continuous binding wall snakes through various programmatic needs including storage, a mechanical closet and a private office. The lack of natural daylight was solved with large panes of glass that borrow light and add views.

 THE SCHOOL OF THE ART INSTITUTE OF CHICAGO, Part Time Professor 2008-2012

COURSES:

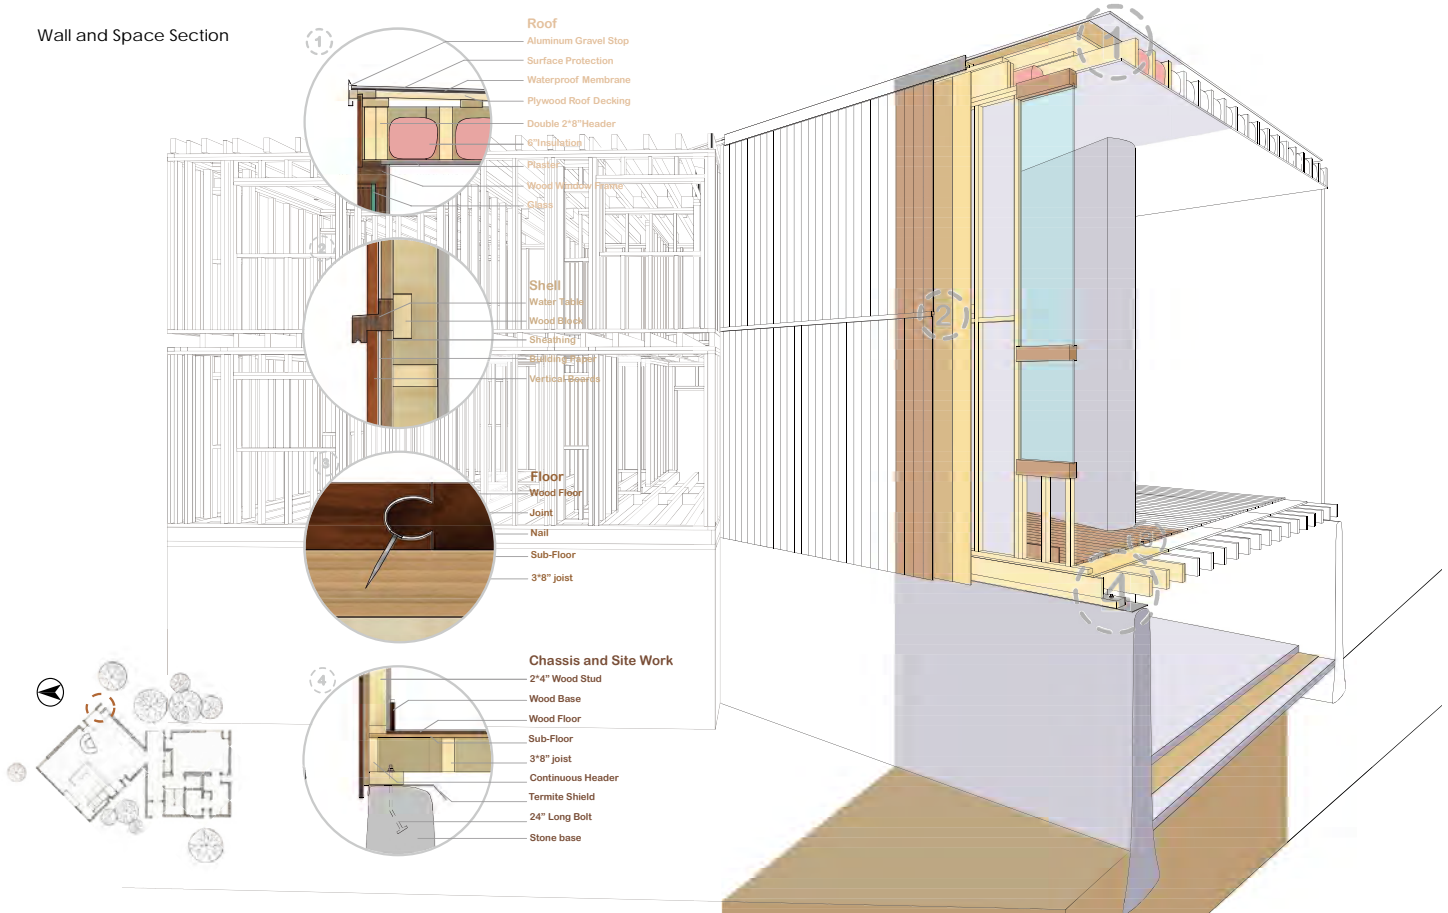

Second Year Studio ARCH 201/202

In the Second Year of study, students explore the dwelling and its components. These studios focus on the development of architectural principles through the study and analysis of building materials, spatial interactions, and the examination of neighborhood context. Consideration is also given to the appropriate use of materials, energy, and construction methodology.

Students develop their visual and verbal communication skills, as well as the graphic language of architecture.
